IN BOSTON MARKETS.

The Prices Are Not Changed Very Materially.

Boston, Jan. 27.—Business is still quiet in the local market for dairy products, but prices do not change any to speak of. The consignments of fresh butter are no better in quality than they usually are at this season of the year, and as the demand is slow, there is some disposition to force sales at the expense of prices. Really fancy fresh goods are scarce and command full quotations and firm prices. The demand for cheese is only moderately active, but dealers are not too well supplied and prices are well maintained, especially for fine York state twins, which are pretty well sold up. There is a little firmer market for fresh western eggs, as invoices are light and much stock is held off the market by shippers' limitations, but dealers are very well supplied with nearly fresh eggs and prices are barely maintained.

Quotations follow:
Butter—Fancy northern creamery, tubs 32@32 1/2 c, boxes and prints 34@35c, western tubs 31@32c, fancy storage 31@32c, dairy 27@28c.
Cheese—York state twins, fancy 15@16 1/2 c, fair to good 13@14c, Vermont twins, fancy 14@14 1/2 c, fair to good 13@13 1/2 c.
Eggs—Fancy henry 35@37c, choice eastern 33@35c, fresh western 32@34c, storage, April extras 36c, May 29@30c.

RIVET MURDER TRIAL GOES ON.

Assistant District Attorney Wier Outlines Government's Case.

Lowell, Jan. 27.—The trial of Napoleon J. Rivet on the charge of murder of Joseph Gailloux was resumed today at the Superior Court. Assistant District Attorney Charles J. Wier opened the trial, outlining the Government's case. Mr. Wier told of the brutal murder of Gailloux, who, he said, was killed in three ways by the blow from a blunt instrument, by suffocation by illuminating gas and by burning with sulphuric acid. The Government intends to show, he said, that Rivet committed the murder. The motive for the murder, he said, rested in the fact that Rivet held an insurance policy for $1,000 on Gailloux's life.

A New Detective Method.

(Copyright, 1909, by American Press Association.)

"As to the Hunker case," said a detective who had been giving an admiring crowd samples of how the craft foretold crime, "it was a stroke of genius."

"A message was sent in to our office by Abraham Hunker, a farmer, that he had lost his life's savings, some $1,000 in gold. He had kept it in a stocking in his chimney, having taken out a brick at one side, leaving a space just big enough to hold the gold. One day while the house was left alone some one stole the money. He asked us to send a man to work up the case."

"Dan Chadwick was in charge of the office at the time and arranged the plan on which the work was to be done. A few days after we got the message a man from the agency appeared at the nearest station to Hunker's farm, hired a horse and drove out to see the farmer. He worked openly, talking about the case in presence of any one who happened to be about. After several days spent in this kind of detective work he went away."

"Some of the people thereabout who knew a thing or two remarked that the fellow was a queer detective, letting everybody know what he and his business was. He wouldn't be likely to learn much that way. The way to work a detective case was for the detective to keep in the dark himself and put a 'bullseye' on everybody else. They gave up any expectation of Hunker ever seeing any of his money again."

"In about ten days another man from our office went to the neighborhood, though this one didn't spend much time with Hunker. He went about among the farmers, told them all that he was a detective and engaged in hunting for the man who stole Hunker's money. This man didn't ask many questions. He didn't tell anything except what I have stated. Then he went away, leaving the farmers to talk about his visit and to speculate from what he had (not) said as to whether he was getting on to a clew. Within a few days after his visit the news of it was spread all over the county."

"It was about two weeks later that another man appeared in the same locality. This man was more like what people expect a detective to be. He went ostensibly as an agent for a steam plow, but he took so many people into his confidence that within a week after his departure everybody knew that another detective had arrived, detected and departed."

"The next man that went on the job put on an air of profound thought. He stayed among the people several days before he let it out that he was a detective. But by this time they had become wrought upon by so many detectives coming among them that he had only to 'let the cat out of the bag' to have the news go like a prairie fire all over the country. He made no mystery of the matter. Indeed, he told Hunker that the discovery had been made that the money had been stolen by a man living in the neighborhood and it would soon be recovered."

"Why doesn't he get away with it?" asked Hunker.

"If he should move he would acknowledge himself to be the thief. You wouldn't need a detective to tell you that any one leaving this region just now would be going to spend his stolen money somewhere else."

"After that the farmers began to be distrustful of each other. They didn't talk any more about the case. They were uncomfortable about it. Every man felt that he was being shadowed. No farmer could go into his house or out of it without fancying that some one stood behind a tree watching him. They began to wish Hunker had let the money go without subjecting them to such surveillance."

"About a month after the loss one of the farmers sent word to the agency asking that a man be sent to him. When the detective arrived he found a pale, haggard man who looked as if he had been keelhaunched. He took the detective back of his house and told him to dig in a certain spot. The detective dug and brought up a cigar box containing the stocking with Hunker's gold in it. When the money was counted every dollar was there."

The speaker paused, and some one asked, "Well, how did it all come about?"

"The first man sent up did not appear as a detective. He learned that no stranger had been to the house about the time the money disappeared. The gold had been kept in the same place for years, and a knowledge of its location had doubtless come to some one of the community, who had been tempted to steal it. Chadwick, the greatest detective genius I have ever known, conceived a plan for forcing the culprit to confess. He sent the first man, who appeared openly for the purpose of spreading abroad the news that the neighborhood was being watched, sending others to confirm this and to keep it in the people's minds. By thus agitating the matter he worked through anybody and everybody upon the guilty party. The man told me after his arrest that he couldn't go among his neighbors without hearing his theft discussed. 'There's another detective here,' was the usual greeting. 'Have you seen him?' Then when worn out with the constant shadow hovering over him he resolved to go somewhere else he learned what the detective had said about any one who should leave, thereby acknowledging his guilt. Then he confessed."
